Our Feast of Song!

Opening Night of the Cincinnati
May Musical Festival.

Brilliant Audience, Fine Weather,
Magnificent Music,

And All Things Working Together for the Success of the Great Undertaking.

All the long bright spring day, bland as summer, with its soft south breezes, yesterday, the thronging crowds gathered to the city, decked with the bonny tricolor of the National bunting, garlands of evergreens and banners everywhere; pictures of Mozart and Beethoven and the other great lights of the musical world in all the windows, and enthusiasm and hospitality in every house and thoroughfare. Last night around the gorgeous Temple of Music vouchsafed us by the conjuring wand of Ramon Springer Aladdin, was, indeed, a scene of almost Oriental enchantment. As the hour of opening the concert approached, the hurrying carriages began to swarm in long lines from every street until the immediate vicinity of the great hall resembled the approaches to St. James Palace on the night of the Queen's drawing-room or the "Avenue de l'Opera," on the occasion of a ball at the Grand Opera under the reign of the late Napoleon. Street cars in endless procession drove up Elm street and unloaded before the door, and the sidewalks were crowded with the gathering hosts, all hastening to the opening festival. Inside the vast temple the scene was even more magnificent. Auditorium, balcony, gallery and lobes all were thronged, (the audience numbering not far from 7,000 persons), before the graduated benches of the stage. When the orchestra was seated the night was one to be remembered for a life time. At the left the brightly costumed alto chorists were placed, while the no less beautiful sopranos, like the petals of a huge pansy, stretched to the right with the soberer male members in the center.

In the center and seated on the level of the stage were the musicians and the choir. Thomas with his magic baton on a crimson dais at the point. Throughout the hall the display of superbly-dressed ladies was magnificent. No such an audience was ever seen before in Cincinnati. Silk and brocades and oriental fabrics and satin and cashmere and other exquisite stuffs in dazzling confusion of elegant costumes were everywhere. Diamonds glittered like stars beneath the blaze of the chandeliers and beauty that dazzled the eye wherever we gazed.

Cincinnati may well be proud of this auspicious opening night of her great festival, apart from any consideration of the musical portion of the entertainment, which, like a jewel of purest water, was brightened—if such were possible—by so fair a setting.

THE INTERMISSION PROMENADE.
In the intermission the vast throng of beautifully costumed ladies and their escorts swarmed into Floral Hall, that had been specially decorated for the occasion with great banks of blooming plants, palms and other tropical shrubbery. The cascade poured its silvery spray down its ledge of rocks, pencils of colored light tinted the silver radiance of the crystal waters with ruby and garnet and amethyst, and the roses and carnations variegated leaved plants and ferns and reaganellas contrasted their rich green with the warm sienna of the tan bark floor when the footfall of the promenaders fell noiseless. At either end of the hall were the refreshment tables, with ices and cool drinks that the crowd partook of largely as they discussed enthusiastically the exquisite music to which they had just been listeners.

THE MUSIC.
Promptly at 7:30 Mr. Theodore Thomas mounted the stage, and a few seconds afterwards the Musical Festival of 1880 was in full blast. The opening work was from Beethoven, the cantata "A Stronghold Sure," adapted for performance by Mr. Theodore Thomas and introduced by an organ prelude composed for the purpose by Mr. Whitney. The choice of an opening work was very happy, as it introduced the audience at once to the chorus, the great organ, the orchestra and most of the soloists. Few indeed were there so critical as not to be profuse in praise of every one and everything that contributed to what was at once pronounced a brilliant and marked success. The power of the orchestra over that of any previous festival was at once apparent, and, for the first time in the history of musical festivals here, the audience heard a body of orchestral artists able to meet all the requirements of the great hall organ and chorus. It is an orchestra, too, in which every performer is an artist worthy of the place he holds. Of the soloists, Miss Cary had no great demand on her ability, but she sung with all the fervor and sweetness for which she is so well known. Signor Campanini did not at first comprehend the vastness of the hall, never having sung in it till the rehearsal, a few days ago, but he soon measured its requirements, and met them with all the splendor and fullness of his magnificent voice. Nothing could have been desired of him unless it be that he had mastered the text and sung his part in English. In the duet especially it hardly seemed the thing for him to sing in Italian and Miss Cary in English. Mr. Whitney was simply Whitney, and more could not be said of him. Miss Norton's score demanded no great work of her. "Mozart's Symphony" in G major, magnificently rendered, closed the first part. It was not till this work was reached that the excellence and power of the great orchestra was fully demonstrated.

val it was expected that its production here would be the first on this continent, but since that time it has been given in Boston. It was, all things considered, the attractive part of last night's programme. The chorus here did its best work and the solo parts calling for no great efforts were elegantly rendered. At the concluding chorus Mr. Thomas turned to the great body of singers he has been so long drilling and gave a look of decided approval and applauded them as warmly as any one in the audience.
